THE RICE TRUST

One of the Founders a Former Arizonian.

The Republican some time ago printed an article on the subject of the formation of a rice trust. It may be interesting to Arizonians to know that one of the organizers of this trust was for many years a resident of Arizona and is now in Phoenix—Mr. W. W. Vanderbilt. Mr. Vanderbilt's partner in the trust is James Shirley, also well known in Arizona. These gentlemen first brought the Cobre Grande property into prominence. They have since established offices in New York. Mr. Vanderbilt was called back to Arizona by the Cobre Grande suits, whose trial was concluded last Thursday.

Speaking of the rice trust, Mr. Vanderbilt said it was not formed for the purpose of raising the price of the article and, in fact, the price has never been raised. Everybody connected with the rice business, from the grower to the consumer has been benefited. The trust, as most trusts do, makes its money by saving what would be wasted by systematic methods. The trust fixes the price of rice, not higher, but fixes it so that a reliable market may be figured upon by every man through whose hands the product passes until it is delivered to the consumer. Rice is now divided into five grades and growers know in which classes their crops belong. Before they take them to the market they know what they will get for them. A new system of cleaning and polishing the rice has been introduced so that the consumer is benefited. The trust controls eighty per cent of the rice crop of the United States and within a year expects to control ninety per cent. It manages its business so that every person who touches rice from the man who sows it to the man who puts it into his mouth is better for it. The only persons who find fault with the trust are democratic orators, who can offer no other objection than that it is a trust.

Of course in the improvement of methods of handling the rice output of the country, less labor, not less agricultural labor, but fewer handlers may be required; there is the least possible waste of human energy; fewer people are working at cross purposes. All who are now in the rice business are now engaged in bringing the grain from the rice fields to the table by the most direct route. There is no pulling or hauling.

Adam had a family tree, but it brought him a heap of trouble. Columbia may be the gem of the ocean, but she can't play foot ball.
